Malala Yousafzai

There is a difference between a leader and a manager and there are different types and styles of leaderships and managements. There are traits about leaders and managers that would distinguish them, such as, their style, behavior, reaction, etc. It takes more than achieving a degree or reading a book to be a leader. It is a mix of the nature of that person, luck (the right person in the right place at the right time), hard work, and an open mind. Historically, successful very well-known names are leaders not managers and that shows from their style and behavior.

Malala Yousafzai is a great young Pakistani leader. She became who she is today from a journey of suffering from an incredibly young age. Malala is the youngest Nobel Prize laureate. She is a rights activist specifically for female rights of education. She has received a huge number of national and international awards and honours.

Malala has many different projects, and the most famous and successful project is the Malala Fund which is working for a world where every girl can learn and lead. Malala Fund invests in education activists and advocates who are driving solutions to barriers to girls' education in their communities. She is a great transformational / visionary leader because she had a positive vision for the future of female education and she succeeded to encourage and motivate the whole entire world to believe, support, and work in her vision with excitement.

Malala changed a lot of girls' lives and futures by giving them the right and opportunity to learn and be able to lead one day. That is a very impressive result for anyone considerably more so thinking about her circumstances. She is an influencer who transferred her vision into an actual result and a project she successfully launched. She transformed thoughts and words into reality.

For me, when it comes to leadership or management, I see myself in many different styles at the same time. All that would depend on many different factors and elements. In my level, I am a mix of all styles based on the situation and the person I am dealing with either upward or downward communication. For example, I am a coach with fresh joiner while I am a commanding leader with another team member in a certain situation. Also, I am sometimes democratic in some areas that I see is suitable. In conclusion, in my opinion, I see that it is right and healthy for my position to choose and customize the leadership style based on the giving state of affairs, environment, and events.
