It is widely known how different Leaders use different approaches paving a team's way towards their pre-set strategic objectives. The leader selected to be showcased in this paper is the former NBA Basket Ball player Michael Jordan, a leader who had delivered his team to a magnificent set of achievements through the ups and downs of his team (Chicago Bulls) using unique leadership styles. A proof of that would be the fact that Michael won the NBA 'Most Valuable Player' award six times while being the captain of that team and solely held himself accountable and determined. Facts state that Chicago Bulls were led by Michael to win 'All NBA First Team' award ten times regardless changes in several team players to move in and out the team.

Michael is believed to have had adopted a Pace-Setting leadership approach leading Chicago Bulls team through their success journey. The reason for that would be the highly focused performance he has illustrated in his games, as well as the fact that he demanded equally focused performance from his colleagues.

In 1997, Michael led his team in a game against Jazz team, while having a flue hit. The whole team was worried about Michael's Performance under the circumstance of sickness and yet, he performed his best until the last moment of the match when he scored the winning hit to end the game with 90-88 for Chicago Bulls and Jazz match respectively.

Unlike Mr. Jordan, I tend to adopt a more democratic approach when it comes to leadership. Open discussions and periodic brain storming sessions are methodologies I have used with my team to ensure acknowledgment of different opinions and enabling them to practice what they are learning. I believe such approach was proven effective for me because it enabled me to identify points of weakness within my decision making process as well as exposure to different points of view, and eventually, made me embrace how people see things differently.
