The inspiring leader to me is Sulaiman Abdulaziz Al-Rajhi. He grew up in a poor family and in harsh financial conditions. From the age of 12, he worked as a porter, a cook and a cashier until he founded Al-Rajhi Bank, the first Islamic bank in Saudi Arabia, and one of the largest Islamic banks in the world with a value of 33 billion US dollars. Four billion dollars of money owns many companies contributing to agricultural, industrial, educational and charitable development, Sheikh Suleiman was passionate about business and trade, and he used to see through them his life successes. This is the reason I chose him and because he possesses more than one effective leadership style, which contributed to being the third richest man in the Arab world, according to Forbes' classification for his humility and love for work.

He was the Democratic Leader, the Coach Leader, and he distinguished a transformational or visionary leadership style. Because he has a vision and believes in the idea of integration and partnership between sectors for the sake of bringing about and sustaining development. That is why the idea of investing in a number of sectors and establishing a number of high-quality, professional and professional enterprises. Such as financial and real estate investment, agriculture, food, industry, education and technology.

Because of his love to help the needy and the poor, he is donating two-thirds of his wealth to be the investment arm that supplies the charitable sector, and this is the great impact that made me write about it.

In conclusion, despite being a democratic person in my professional field and with employees, I find myself in transformational leadership and I prefer setting clear, positive goals that motivate my workers to change themselves, groups and the organization to achieve our common goals, it is my approach in my organization and the catalyst for those around me to achieve unprecedented results in my country's 2030 vision.
