

Great Leader as a Great World

I am quite delighted to choose a Man who I consider him as a great leader who is my manager named Mr. Hajjar, Managing Director at Andersen Global, Riyadh, Saudi Arabia.

There are clear differences between the two characters; manager and Leader of a person which are includes; a manager manages their employees, while a leader inspires them to innovate, think creatively, and strive for perfection. Every team has a boss, but what people need is a leader who will help them achieve greatness.

Mr. Hajjar, is a motivated, forward-thinking and also intelligent who has lots of knowledge project and risk Management & Internal Auditing field also in Finance. He is wonderful to work with, and has an exceptional expertise in leadership, coaching motivation. He consistently demonstrated a solid work ethic at Project, Risk Management & Internal Audit department spanning more than a one decade. He has a unique ability to organize the working process in a way that lets employees exhibit the full extent of their professional skills. A wonderful sense of humor in combination with deep empathy enabled him to lift my spirits in exceptionally stressful situations. I had the pleasure of working with Mr. Hajjar as a professional consultant and business development.

I rarely come across real talents in Finance department along with Internal Auditing who stand out like Mr. Hajjar. He has an Essential Project Management Skills for The Modern World of Work; leadership, time management, planning and effective communication. In the modern world of digital technology – where the cloud, Big Data, and mobile devices are changing what's possible – even the best project managers find their powers significantly restricted by poor technology; and on the other hand, the right tools can elevate them to new levels. In this essay we are going to outline four essential project management skills that are required for success in the modern workplace and how technology can help.

With so many moving pieces and so much at stake, every team needs a leader like him to weigh up the options and make the tough decisions. Almost by definition, a project manager is a leader and therefore needs strong leadership qualities to be successful in the job. Whether it's making tough decisions about resource allocation or keeping a cool head when reacting to unexpected obstacles mid-project, leadership skills are incredibly important.

He can able to motivate and inspire the team, and always remain cool under pressure. But without 100% visibility over our resources, it can be difficult to stay on top of a project. A lot of the popular Internal Audit Project do not offer viable options for resource management, forcing project managers to use outdated applications like Excel. Excel doesn't offer the visibility required to get to grips with resource data in a way that can help great leaders lead from the front.

Getting projects completed on time is a key measure of success for project managers. Being able to schedule your resources so that tasks are completed on time is therefore fundamental. Great project managers must be able to manage their own time as well as the time of every member of their team. Priorities, schedules, and timelines help project managers deliver on time.

Optimizing resource allocation by making sure the right tasks are allocated to the right people is key to ensuring time isn't wasted. Timesheets are a project manager's best friend in achieving this goal. Using technology to input timesheet data which can be easily analyzed alongside resource data can really help a project manager boost the efficiency of their teams.

Everyone needs to be clear on their roles and objectives. People need to know what jobs they have been allocated and the timeframes they need to abide by. Also, key stakeholders at the board level, or in the project management office (PMO), need to be updated on all resource and project data so that they can provide initial sign-off and then, post-project, measure success.

Finally, I must say that I am enchanted to express my innermost feeling about Mr.Hajjar. His relentless efforts regarding my professional enhancement seems to be a great instance of leadership.
