Introduction

Leadership is the process of guiding a team to reach a specific goal. A leader is the head of a team who does the process of guiding that team to reach the mutual target. It is an essential part of a group and it is like the brain in the human body. Without a leader, there will be chaos. The success of any project in a team depends mostly on the decision-making skills of the team leader. Thus, a leader has to be skilled because the better the leader the better the team, and the better the outcome of the project.

Leadership with Methodology

Leadership is the process of affecting and guiding a team to reach a certain target and it is a relationship between a leader and members. A leader is a person with an authority over one or more persons, the leader provides guidance to the individuals to reach a common goal. A leader is responsible to connect, listen, and direct all the team members to fulfill the target. For instance, president Abraham Lincoln, the 16th president of the United States, used his authority as the leader and the president of the United States to abolish slavery and to improve the economy of his country. He also had led the country in the American Civil War. A leader should be trusted by his followers in order to be a successful leader. He is responsible to observe the team decisions and he is responsible for making the final decision. Also, they should be in the front line to face any problem that may cross the team. In addition, a good leader should engage their group in making decisions, finding solutions, and solving problems. A leader should be the source of inspiration, motivation, and cooperation in the group.

A good leader should have high emotional intelligence. According to Harvard Business Review, effective leadership comes not only by reading books and taking training courses, but through life experience, practice, and continual learning. A friend of mine is a very nerdy psychologist who struggled with his job. He told me that despite how much he reads or attends training courses about psychology, he still lacks connection and understanding of his patients' feelings and situations. However, one day he lost his father in a car accident. He also had problems in his family and in his job during that time. He told me that his life became a mess and he lost control over it and became depressed severely. He started drinking severely and started to have some suicidal thoughts. Nevertheless, his family supported him, took care of him, and helped him to overcome his depression. After he got cured of depression, he became a great psychologist because he gained what he lacked which is the experience of being a victim of depression. He became a well-known leader who helped to spread the awareness of depression in his city and of course, he helped many patients in his clinic. A good leader should have high emotional intelligence, which is "putting yourself in the other person's shoes" or in other words, understanding other people's emotions and situations and treating them in a way that they understand, accept, and satisfy. Clever leaders understand their followers' emotions and have the ability to control their own emotions.

A good leader should be able to communicate his experience to others. In the book the Secrets of the Millionaire Mind, T. Harv Eker tells his story of how he gained financial freedom and became a millionaire. He said that he failed in many businesses when he was in his early 20s. Despite how much he tried to be rich and successful, he kept failing and losing money. Therefore, he started to study millionaires. He studied their mindsets, lifestyles, and their way of making plans. After he spent a long time studying them, he understood that the problem is not the way he administers his businesses, but his financial mindset and the way he thinks about money. Thus, he worked on his mindset to make it like the millionaires'. After that, he gained the financial freedom he dreamt of and became a millionaire. He also became a leader in coaching others to become rich. He helped so many people and lead them to be successful and his book the Secrets of the Millionaire Mind became the number one in New York Times, Wall Street Journal, and USA Today bestseller. Thus, a good leader should have enough knowledge, self-awareness, experience, interpersonal acumen, and a vision to share with others. He also should be determined to change people's lives and to guide them toward success.

A great leader should have a clear vision with a specific deadline. One of the leaders that are making a huge impact on their countries and the whole world is the royal prince Mohammed Bin Salman. He used one of the most important skills that any extraordinary leader should have which is sharing his own vision with the people. By sharing his vision, which is the vision of 2030, and setting a timeline to that vision, he made the people in Saudi Arabia work passionately to help fulfill that vision and made the whole world excited and waiting to experience the vision to come into existence. He has set that vision and is working on it because he knew exactly what the people need, which is also one of the greatest skills a leader, should have. Furthermore, the royal prince has a high level of determination and passion, which made us see his progress of the 2030 vision annually.

A great and ethical leader should be able to stand up to what he or she believed to be right and should work on solving problems. My brother is a respiratory therapist. His job requires him to work with other healthcare workers as a team. He is responsible for all the different types of breathing devices and different medical gasses delivered to his patients. One night, while he was on his shift, he noticed that the anesthesiologist who was delivering medical treatment to one of the patients is using the wrong device. Thus, my brother told the doctor gently about what he did wrong and explained what each device is used for and what is the best device to perform for that patient. Although the doctor seemed to lack a lot of knowledge about airway management, and airway resuscitators and devices. He ignored my brothers' advice. My brother put his patient safety first. Therefore, He called his supervisor and told him about that doctor who lacks information and how dangerous that is to the patients. Then, his supervisor delivered that message to the dean. Doing so, forced that doctor to get the proper education and helped preventing the medical mistakes that could happen from that doctor. My brother was a leader who helped his patient and all the patients that could be treated by that anesthesiologist.

Result

In conclusion, not anyone can be a good leader. A good leader should possess specific skills in order to be effective and successful such as having enough knowledge, experience, and practicing and learning for the entire life. A leader should also be able to deliver and share his knowledge and experience to the people, should know exactly what the people need, and should be able to understand their feeling and emotions. In addition, A good leader should have the ability to solve people's problems and coaches them to succeed. Also, he should have a clear vision with a specific deadline that motivates the followers and give them a clear target that they can reach.
